Background: Born and raised in Olympia, Eliza believes public spaces -- particularly green ones -- are one of the best aspects of Seattle living. As a public health researcher at the Urban Indian Health Institute, she focuses on preventing substance abuse among Native youth. Her work coupled with her studies at Macalester College (St. Paul, MN) inspire an interest in understanding and building common spaces that are socially and ecologically healthy -- for the benefit of both individuals and their diverse communities. As an avid runner, Eliza is frequently on the move in Seattle's parks, trails and green spaces; with all that time on feet she's often thinking about ways to make these places more accessible, equitable and sustainable. Drawing on prior work experience as non-partisan staff for the Washington State Senate, Eliza looks to respond both to emergent community needs and invest in long-horizon goals to strengthen parks and recreational opportunities. You can also find her working out in parks with November Project or serving as a volunteer coach for adaptive cross country skiing with Outdoors for All!
