Background:

Amy currently works at Facebook as the Public Policy and Community Engagement Manager. She was previously the Director of State Government Affairs at Code.org, a non-profit focused on expanding computer science education in our public schools, focusing on girls and underrepresented students of color. Amy has experience working with local and state governments and non-profits. She is passionate about equitable access to technology and the Internet. Amy's previous experience in technology and digital equity includes being the outreach manager at the EdLab Group, a nonprofit organization that strives to leverage the power of technology and diversity to transform teaching and learning. Additionally, she was the outreach coordinator for Communities Connect Network, a project working on digital inclusion issues for the State of Washington. Amy has previously worked with the City of Seattle by managing the Seattle Communities Online Project, a program aimed at helping neighborhood and community groups use social networking tools to build community and increase civic engagement and also coordinated logistics with Code for America, a non-profit creating civic engagement tools to better engage residents to solve local problems.

Amy has a Master of Public Administration degree from the Daniel J. Evans School of Public Affairs at the University of Washington.
